Immigration has become a sensitive and divisive issue in many societies. This panel discussion aims to shed light on the politicisation of immigration debates in Europe, Singapore and Australia, and dissect the discourse and rise in populist resistance to immigration. Also discussed will be issues concerning social cohesion, integration and national security that are often linked to the immigration anxieties.

This panel discussion is part of the Migration Policy Dialogue held in Singapore associated with the EU-funded Jean Monnet Policy, Politics, Culture: EU Migration and Integration (PPCEUMI) network which brings together expertise in migration policy from Europe, Asia and the Pacific to explore the emerging shifts in migration policy making. Policy, Politics, Culture: EU Migration and Integration (PPCEUMI) is focused on the study of third-country migrant integration in the EU through the lenses of politics, policy, governance, and culture. Policy- and solution-oriented, PPCEUMI focuses on the immediate period of pre- and point of arrival of migrants, as well as considering the longer-term process of integration. This Jean Monnet network of 5 partner institutions operates with the support of the Erasmus+ Programme of the European Union.
